A body's ability to control energy homeostasis, the process by which it regulates the balance between energy intake and energy expenditure, is diminished with obesity. Some aspects of this process are mediated by the interaction of hormone-sensitive lipase (HSL) with the transcription factor Steroid Receptor Coactivator-1 (SRC-1). The function of HSL is limited to the hydrolysis of triglycerides to free fatty acids and glycerol, and the availability of free fatty acids likely reflects their potential to activate SRC-1. These observations suggest that the activity of SRC-1 is an important component of energy homeostasis. To investigate this hypothesis, our laboratory has established cell culture systems using normal human preadipocytes and adipocytes that have a reduced ability to regulate energy homeostasis. These cell culture systems provide excellent experimental models to examine the role of SRC-1 and HSL in energy homeostasis. The proposed study will address the following questions: 1) Do obesity-associated alterations in metabolism and adipocyte morphology lead to reduced regulation of SRC-1 and HSL in adipocytes? 2) Do cell culture studies with established HSL-/- and SRC-1-/- mouse adipocytes replicate changes in energy homeostasis seen in obesity? 3) Are adipocytes deficient in HSL unable to store triglyceride? 4) What are the effects of an HSL deficiency on adipocyte morphology? The proposed research is significant for public health because of the rising epidemic of obesity and its associated disorders. The results obtained from this study will improve our understanding of mechanisms that regulate energy homeostasis. Moreover, the identification of mechanisms regulating fatty acid mobilization in adipocytes could lead to novel targets for therapy.
